Unity Through Higher Education?

How Increased Access to a Postsecondary Education May Soothe Post- Election Discord

By Brian Sorenson CAEL

It was impossible during CAEL's 2016 International Conference last week to avoid the topic of the presidential election and what the results will mean for higher education in the U.S. As panels of experts noted throughout the duration of the conference, it's of course far too soon to make any prognostication about the ramifications of the elections with any real confidence.

As pundits, policy wonks and academics only start to debate about the potential long-term impact of the election, however, some experts are looking at how an increased access to education opportunities could provide reason for optimism for those belonging to all sides of the political spectrum.

Specifically, Daniel Greenstein, director of postsecondary success at the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, spoke at CAEL's opening keynote "Higher Education at the Crossroads: Bridge to Opportunity or Reproducer of Privilege?" about some of the potential opportunities for bipartisan cooperation to improve access to higher education. ## Protecting Your Pets

Almost 80 million American families own a pet. If you are one of those families, you know how much love and joy they bring into the home. Many of us take our canine or feline companions in the car to the pet store, dog park or for long hikes. In fact, a new survey found that 85 percent of dog owners travel with their pet. Unfortunately, hundreds of thousands of them get hurt or killed each year in accidents while traveling in cars and trucks.

California Casualty Auto & Home Insurance, an AICUO Affiliate Member since 2012, knows how important your furry friends are to you and your family and we are stepping up to help protect them. Click here to continue reading
